WHAT WE THINK

on the month's news.

The 'race card'

It is not often that Spearhead finds itself agreeing with the leadership of the Labour Party but last month provided one such occasion.

Upon the Queen's Speech, delivered to mark the reopening of parliament on November 15th and listing the Government's policy aims for the coming year, Labour reacted immediately by describing the contents of the speech as nothing better than an electioneering stunt. In the words of Labour chief Tony Blair, it was "a cobbling together of any old bric-a-brac of legislation that can keep the Tory Party in one piece." Labour was especially venomous against the proposed new legislation to tighten up on controls over illegal immigration and bogus asylum seekers, describing it as a playing of the 'race card' for party political gain in the run-up to the next general election.

In fact, this diagnosis, especially in as much as it applies to the 'race card', is not far wide of the mark. Periodically, the Tories, while their record in controlling immigration is truly lamentable, feel the itch to cash in on the strong sentiments of the general public on this issue and pose as a party dedicated to defending the national frontiers. It was tried by Mrs. Thatcher in her pre-election speech of 1979, when she talked about the danger of Britain being 'swamped', only for her Government later to preside over greater swamping than ever. Now, desperate to clutch at straws that may recapture some of the Tories' waning public support, Mr. Major is playing the same game. A committed 'anti-racist', he is introducing the bogus refugee issue as a quite cynical ploy to cadge votes that would otherwise very likely go to the genuinely anti-immigration British National Party, which aims to stand 50 or more candidates in the election of 1997.

Actually, Major is being artful here. He most certainly will have calculated that the introduction of the issue into the Queen's Speech would give it special prominence and provoke yells of protest from the Opposition benches, thus getting Labour to reveal a weak chink in its armour. Labour at the moment is riding high in the popularity stakes. What better way to undermine a bit of its popularity than to deliver a reminder to the British public that it is pre-eminently the pro-immigrant party? Clever trick, John!

Here, of course, is just one more example of an issue of vital importance to the future of Britain being used as a cheap manoeuvre in party political warfare — without either of the parties in question being prepared to deal with the issue firmly, courageously and in Britain's interest.

Refugees: whether bogus or genuine is irrelevant

The Asylum and Immigration Bill now being prepared is purported to streamline the handling of asylum applications. One of its proposals is to draw up a 'White List' of countries reckoned to have a good record in 'human rights' and then force asylum seekers from those countries to prove 'persecution' before they can be considered for admission to Britain. The key rule here is that applicants must be found to be genuine refugees — that is to say with hard evidence of unjust ill-treatment in their countries of origin — as distinct from bogus refugees who are merely trying to get into Britain to exploit the opportunity to make more money (usually by milking our welfare state).

It all sounds very right and proper but in fact it is a lot of silly nonsense.

To every country not gripped by an urge to national suicide there is only one criterion of whether a foreign national should be admitted to the country for permanent residence: that of whether the person is of a racial make-up that will enable him or her to be integrated easily into the national body and thence become a useful and valuable citizen. And even in the case of applicants passing this racial test there is the further consideration of whether, by their personal character, they are people whom the country wants. When a person is 'finding it tough' in his or her native country it can often be for very good reasons. Perhaps that person is a subversive or troublemaker or just a plain criminal. In the case of such people bidding to come to Britain we must ask the question: do we really want them to transfer to this country the activities that have got them into hot water back home? Why must it always be assumed that a refugee is an innocent victim of persecution and injustice and not a thorough undesirable whom any country would be better off by being rid of? But of course the moment the word 'refugee' is mentioned 'liberals' of every stripe 'ooh' and 'aah' in swooning adulation and sympathy which invests the person in question with unquestioned virtue — and all without the least attempt to find out whether that person is a fit candidate to become a member of the British population.

For all these reasons, we think it matters not whether a would-be immigrant's claim to be a refugee is bogus or genuine; what matters is whether it is in our interest to take that immigrant in.

Perhaps someone will draw this point to the Home Secretary's attention!

Anti-family legislation: Government treads on yet another banana skin

Much has been said and written about two recent pieces of legislation prepared by the Government and then subsequently put on hold, both of which would have struck yet further blows at the institution of the family that is already falling apart. On the one hand there was the proposal in the Divorce White Paper that the maximum waiting time for a divorce be cut to one year. Then there was the Family Homes and Domestic Violence Bill, which would grant to live-in partners exactly the same rights in the event of a breakdown in relationships as legally married husbands and wives. This latter bill is now being delayed and may indeed be scrapped following a public furore which led to the Government making a humiliating climb-down over it.

Of course, both pieces of legislation would have had disastrous social effects, as many MPs and journalists, to their credit, have said. But that is not all. Here was just one more policy idea dreamed up by this Government which bore all the hallmarks of scarcely having five minutes of serious thought behind it. Here was just another banana skin on which the Government could not help treading. Here again was an example not only of that Government's sickeningly 'liberal' orientation but also of its almost unbelievable incompetence.

Just how do such jokers insinuate themselves into the highest positions in the land and acquire the power they have over us? Think and discuss.

A hanging few give a damn about

Up to last month there could hardly have been one person in a million in Britain who had ever heard of Ken Saro-Wiwa. Now that gentleman is a hero and martyr on whose behalf all the world's politically correct and politically retarded are shrieking, demonstrating and threatening — including our own Prime Minister Mr. John Major, no less.

Mr. Saro-Wiwa, it appears, was a Nigerian who incurred the displeasure of his country's military government by leading a campaign of terror and violence on behalf of the Ogoni tribe which included assassinations of four of their own people who were considered not fanatical enough in their pursuit of the tribe's grievances.

Unlike in Britain, where governments sit down with terrorists and parly with them in a spirit of give-and-take, the Government of Nigeria arrested Saro-Wiwa and hanged him.

This hanging, believe it or not, became an item on the agenda of the latest Commonwealth Conference in New Zealand, with Mr. Major televised making an impassioned condemnation of the Nigerian Government and hinting that Nigeria should be expelled from the Commonwealth if that was how it went about its business.

All of which leaves the mind boggling at such an incredible waste of time. Did the conference not have more important things to discuss? And just what does it matter to Britain whether Nigeria is a member of the Commonwealth or not?

Mr. Saro-Wiwa may have been unjustly hanged. On the other hand he may not. The cause of the Ogoni tribe on whose behalf he was carrying out his campaign may be a just one. On the other hand it may not.

Either way, we simply could not give a damn. And Britain should not give a damn either.

We have enough troubles on our plate in this country. We just haven't the time to take on our shoulders the troubles of Nigeria too.

All things to everyone

Defence Secretary Michael Portillo, it will be remembered, made himself the darling of the Tory right when at this year's party conference in October he made an impassioned speech against Britain allowing her forces to be incorporated into an all-European army.

TWO-FACED POLITICIAN?
Portillo with the troops (British in this case)

It may therefore seem strange that the same Mr. Portillo was last month seen to be heading for a meeting in Madrid to argue in favour of closer European integration in military matters. This followed a speech back home reported in The Sunday Telegraph of November 12th as "playing down any impression that he was opposed to a common European defence force."

How come these contradictions? It's simple! Mr. Portillo is a politician, and a politician's job is to please the audience he is speaking to. In October he was speaking to a Tory Party conference at which many 'Euro-Sceptics' were present and where his name was being touted as a future party leader. Last month he was addressing dedicated Eurocrats. Different listeners, different approach!

The Spectator of 11th November touched upon the same subject in an article titled 'The resurgence of the party hack'. This dealt with Tory selection meetings at which would-be candidates presented themselves to party committees for approval. The writer, Michael Gove, spoke of the 'tactical guile' of many of the prospective adoptees, and went on to say:-

"... Their public profiles are kept deliberately ambiguous in order to maximise the chances of selection in a party whose views are still far more motley than monochrome. Closet wets thus argue for savage tax cuts to arouse the audience in Essex marginals; Thatcherite ultras — to satisfy the loyalist instincts of Lancashire ladies — praise Mr. Major for keeping his options open on the single currency."

So it seems that the coming wave of young Tory hopefuls is going to differ not very much from the last, of which Mr. Portillo was of course one. Political chameleons all of them — in the true tradition of the party game. Nothing changes!

More royal ethnic grovelling

When speaking earlier about the Commonwealth conference in New Zealand last month we might have mentioned that the Queen was there on Britain's behalf as well as Mr. Major. What her Majesty's view (if any) was about the Nigeria hanging we do not know, but what we do know is that she used the occasion of the opening of the conference to engage (no doubt on the say-so of her government advisers) in a quite disgusting piece of grovelling to the local Maoris, delivering a formal apology on behalf of Britain for the seizure of their land by British settlers in the 19th century.

Of course, the logic of such an apology is that all New Zealand's 3½ million Whites should leave the country and come back to Britain (or wherever else their ancestors came from). Her Majesty did not go quite as far as making that suggestion, but it is difficult to see how this gesture of penance could make any sense otherwise.

Geoffrey Wheatcroft, writing in the Daily Mail on November 4th, roundly condemned the silliness of this and other confessions of white racial guilt. "All of this neurotic mania for grievance and apology," he said, "belongs to what we have gloomily come to know as political correctness..." And he continued further on:-

"... if the history of the past 500 years has been the story of what Europe did to other continents, this is only the culmination of a human history which has consisted of migration, conquest and subjugation."

And:-

"Irish republicanism draws heavily, and unpleasantly, on this culture of victimhood to justify its war against the Ulster Unionists. But the ironies of this are rich. I have read pro-IRA sheets in Boston and New York which say plainly that the Ulster protestants have no right to live in Ireland since their ancestors didn't live there 500 years earlier. This is a point which I should be cautious of making if I were an Irish American. Who the hell do they think Massachusetts belongs to on that basis?"

DOING PENANCE
The Queen in New Zealand last month

"But then the cult of historical guilt and apology has little to do with reason. The frankly bizarre Act which the Queen signed on Thursday (offering recompense to the Maoris for their former dispossession. Ed.) was produced by a mood of self-hating guilt which is gnawing away at Australasia. Among the Australian left it is now axiomatic that the Aborigines were not only conquered, which is true, but that they possessed a superior culture to their conquerors, which is absurd.

"It seems not to have occurred to those breast-beating Australian liberals that they are in a logically impossible position. Some say, like Dr. Germaine Greer, that 'Australia must become a black country', whatever that may mean. But if the Aussie left means what it says about the unmitigated wickedness of colonial settlement, it would be more logical still for them to return to Europe en masse, or to throw themselves off Sydney Harbour Bridge."

Neither of which, of course, Australian liberals and lefties would dream of doing. It is the self-assumed prerogative of people of this ilk — here in Britain no less than everywhere else — to enjoy the comforts of a modern western-style civilisation and technology while enjoying equally the self-gratifying sensation of condemning all the conquests of their forebears which made such things possible.

The alarming thing is that this humbug and insanity are not now confined to the circles of left-wing nutters. They are being mouthed by our Monarch herself with the undoubted encouragement of her Tory Government.

Afterthought: Would our Australian readers please inform us when Dr. Greer has given away all her imperialistically acquired possessions and moved in with the natives of the Northern Territory?

A man with good credentials

The very probable Labour Party candidate for Exeter in the next general election is Mr. John Lloyd. Mr. Lloyd's rather interesting background was revealed in the newspapers in late October.

A South African by birth and a barrister, he was a passionately committed member of the Anti-Apartheid movement in his country of origin back in the 1960s and a close associate of one John Harris. In case Mr. Harris's name does not ring any bells with readers, he also was an Anti-Apartheid militant, and in order to further his cause he planted a bomb in a Johannesburg railway station which killed an elderly woman and permanently maimed a small girl. When Harris was caught and put on trial, Lloyd, who knew of the crime, turned state witness against him and helped to ensure his conviction. Whether this was out of conscience or to save his own skin probably only Mr. Lloyd himself will ever know.

Later, Lloyd hopped it to Britain, where he has lived ever since. Not entirely surprisingly, he became a member of the Labour Party, in which he would have met many bosom pals.

Lloyd concealed his own past activities as a bomber until someone acquainted with his background blew the whistle on him. Thereupon he came clean but insisted that he had only ever bombed 'symbolic targets' such as telegraph poles and that he was an opponent of any activity that threatened human lives. He did not explain how he could ever be sure that when these 'symbolic targets' were hit some people who happened to be nearby would not be killed in consequence.

It seems, anyway, that Lloyd's former career as a terrorist bomber is no barrier to his standing for parliament under the Labour banner. In the good cause of fighting Apartheid, no doubt, anything goes in the eyes of Labour.

Lloyd of course now finds it expedient to distance himself from Harris. But when that murderer was cremated back in South Africa three decades ago — after his deeds were universally known — a 15-year-old boy read out an address to the assembled mourners, speaking nostalgically of his friendship for the deceased 'John'. Since then that boy has come far. He is now Labour MP for Neath in South Wales, otherwise known as Peter Hain.

Mr. Lloyd, like Mr. Hain, obviously has what it takes to do well with Labour — the party which, so we are told, is now bidding for occupancy of the political 'centre ground'!

Message from Quebec

In the Quebec referendum on the 31st October voters opted by the tiniest majority to stay in Canada. As many commentators have said since, the referendum really solved nothing, for the province clearly remains deeply divided. It was later found that it was only the intervention of non-French-speakers and ethnic minorities which prevented a vote in favour of secession; a clear majority of French-Canadians had in fact delivered just such a vote. The actual result was 50.56 per cent in support of the status-quo and 49.44 per cent for separation.

We should learn something from the Quebec problem, which has dogged Canadian politics for a long time. The problem simply is that multi-ethnic nations do not work. Very similar stocks, such as the constituent peoples who make up the British Isles, can by centuries of internal migration and cross-breeding eventually jell together — this process being greatly facilitated if they are bound for the most part by a common language. Between the French and English-speaking Canadians, however, there are much more fundamental differences, perhaps aggravated by the fact that it was in the City of Quebec itself that the battle occurred which determined that people of British race would become the dominant group in Canada, and that this piece of history is a constant reminder not only of difference but of old rivalry and enmity.

The divisions in Canada provide in microcosm the reality that will for ever prevent the true integration of Europe, just as, nearer home, the same kind of microcosm manifests itself in what was Yugoslavia. If people of French and mainly British stock cannot endure as parts of one nation on the North American Continent, neither will they do so on this one.

The news that reaches us from Canada is that, if the Quebecers are constantly in a state of discontent with their status within the country, the English-speakers who form the rest of the population are fed up to the teeth with their complaints. Whether Canada can now hold together in the fragile unity that has resulted from this hairsbreadth referendum result remains to be seen. If it does not, however, English-speaking Canadians, a slight majority of whom (non-Whites excluded) are of British descent, ought to be reminded that over here in the United Kingdom are fifty-odd million who share far more in common with them than do their French-speaking fellow Canadian citizens. The feeling of the British for their kin in Canada was amply demonstrated earlier this year over the fishing dispute with Spain. Blood ties are more binding than the proximities of geography. We must hope that the day will eventually return when political allegiances reflect this eternal truth.

Special people!

London's police chief, Sir Paul Condon, having severely blotted his copybook with the nation's mightily powerful 'anti-racist' lobbies by his statement about most muggers in the capital being black, seems extremely anxious to make amends. Last month, it was reported in the Jewish Chronicle, Sir Paul was the guest at a meeting of the Association of Jewish Ex-Servicemen and Women. Addressing the gathering, he gave a strong hint that he was in favour of yet more draconian laws against 'racism'.

"It is a fact of life," he said, speaking of 'racist' propaganda, "that many organisations that peddle this trash have access to the best legal advice." And he continued: "We will do our best to stop these people but it is up to parliament to set the legal framework."

Some people not acquainted with the realities of where power resides in Britain might naively ask the question: what is London's chief of police doing addressing such a meeting and why is it the case that so many eminent public servants are regularly to be found speaking to and seeking the approval of Jewish organisations?

The question might be taken a step further. When last month the funeral was held in Jerusalem for assassinated Israeli leader Yitzhak Rabin, present were the heads of all Britain's main political parties, together with the heads of state of practically all the world's leading nations, as well as representatives of Europe's royalty. Here is a country with a population smaller than that of Lancashire, and yet the funeral of its President is considered a fit occasion for the congregating together of such a glittering array of important people from across the globe! Just what is so special about this tiny nation?

But to revert to the question of 'race' legislation, it is a fact that the body to whom Sir Paul Condon was speaking has for some considerable time been in the forefront of agitation for tougher laws. A headline in the Jewish Chronicle of the 26th May this year said: "AJEX declares all-out war on race hate-mongers." The article following reported that:-

"The Association of Jewish Ex-Servicemen and Women is throwing its weight behind moves for a Europe-wide strategy to outlaw all manifestations of race-hatred and anti-semitism.

"The 5,400-strong organisation backed an emergency resolution at its annual conference on Sunday calling on the Government to support moves at the 1996 Inter-Governmental Conference 'to criminalise the growing distribution' of race-hate propaganda.

The resolution, said the report, was supported unanimously.

They were at it again a short time later. This time it was the Board of Deputies of British Jews. The Jewish Chronicle of the 23rd June reported that: "Board urges Major to end opposition to EU race law". This was followed by a report saying:-

"Jewish leaders this week urged the Prime Minister to abandon Britain's opposition to a proposed European law against racism when he attends next week's EU summit in Cannes."

Last month 'Jewish leaders' were again found protesting to the Government. This time it was over the plans by Social Security Secretary Peter Lilley to slash welfare benefits for asylum-seekers. The Jewish Chronicle of November 17th reported:-

"In a joint submission, the Board of Deputies, the Jewish Council for Racial Equality (Jcore) and World Jewish Relief argue that such a policy would be a betrayal of the state's responsibility towards vulnerable sections of society."

Just what does all this sound like? It sounds to us very much like a people who seem to think themselves granted some special right to agitate, to demand, to criticise and to lobby on this matter and that — almost as if they themselves, and not our elected Government, were responsible for running the country. It sounds like a people who have a special status in our country and indeed around the world and are very aware of it and anxious at every turn to assert it.

They appear to be passionately opposed to 'racism' and to be all in favour of countries, including our own, opening their doors to refugees of other races.

But a look at the crowds in Israel seen on television attending Mr. Rabin's funeral revealed something most interesting — just as did a look at the TV shots of the crowds present at the rally when Rabin was shot. On neither occasion was a black face was to be seen anywhere!

Indeed, special people — with a special importance, special rights, special prerogatives, special exemptions. But of course by the very fact of daring to say this we shall most certainly be accused of the very 'anti-semitism' which these people want to have made a criminal offence! But in fact all we are asking of the Jews is that they regard themselves the same as everyone else and are treated the same as everyone else.

Argentina: just what is the Government up to?

Last month, with much publicity, Princess Diana made an official visit to Argentina. Those folk who imagine that this visit was just part of the normal diplomatic rounds would have to be very naive. Exactly what passed between the Princess and her Argentine hosts is not so far known. What is certain, however, is that the Government seems almost indecently anxious to be good pals again with the Argies after all the bad blood stirred up by the Falklands War. Just what have Major & Co. got up their sleeve?

WHAT ARE THEY COOKING UP?
Major with President Menem

In a report in the Daily Mail last month it was stated of the Princess that:-

"The fear was that she will be used as the centrepiece of a nationalist triumph by Argentinian President Carlos Menem, an arch manipulator who has already transformed a meeting with John Major into a propaganda coup.

"Buenos Aires was gearing up to greet Diana as a powerful political symbol, her presence justifying the country's mounting confidence that it will regain control of the Falkland islands sooner rather than later."

The question must be asked: if Argentina has such confidence that it is going to get the Falklands back, from where and from what has it acquired that confidence? The only possible answer is that it must have come from signals given out to the Argentines by our own Government.

This seems to be confirmed by the recent signing by Britain and Argentina of a treaty to co-operate on oil exploration around the Falklands. The Government was hugely embarrassed when just afterwards Menem referred to the treaty as the first real step forward in his country's permanent struggle to gain sovereignty. An indignant repudiation of this was issued from Whitehall but what other purpose can there be in the treaty? If the Falklands are British, which they are, so also is the oil around their shores. Why must Britain, which has acquired plenty of expertise in oil exploration in the North Sea, bring the Argies in on this project instead of going it alone?

There is a stink in the air here, and the stink is one of betrayal — betrayal of the brave young men who died to keep the Union Jack flying over those distant British Islands. Ulster all over again? You bet!

A FRONT-PAGE HEADLINE in the Sunday Times of the 22nd October said "Tories split as Labour seizes centre ground." In the report following it was stated that:-

"The fragile truce inside the Conservative Party was shattered last night as a Sunday Times NOP poll showed that the voters now regard Labour as the party of the political centre ground, and more moderate than an increasingly right-wing Tory party."

The report went on to say that:-

"Senior Tories on the left of the party warned that it was heading for electoral oblivion unless John Major reverses what they regard as a decisive shift to the right. Their warnings have been echoed privately by several government ministers, who have told Tory whips they are deeply unhappy about the 'right-wing drift' at this month's party conference."

The new poll, said the writers, Andrew Grice and Michael Prescott, provides the clearest evidence so far that Tony Blair had captured the political 'centre ground'. And they continued:-

"... Only one in four people (23 per cent) regards Labour as left-wing and 50 per cent describe it as moderate, while more people (39 per cent) believe the Tories are right-wing than think they are moderate (34 per cent). Blair has repositioned Labour closer to the ideological home of most voters: seven out of 10 people (69 per cent) regard themselves as moderate."

The report then went on to quote one senior Tory Government minister as saying: "Although Blair's decision to camp on the centre ground is a great compliment to us, we are playing into his hands by moving to the right. We will end up with a very low share of the vote at the general election." Further on, it quoted another Tory, Peter Temple-Morris, MP for Leominster and a founder of the Macleod group of Tory left-wingers. He said the NOP poll would intensify the group's fears about the party's rightward shift. "Elections," he said, "are not won by the extremes. That is not the way of the British people."

He was backed up by another Tory, Hugh Dykes, member for Harrow East and chairman of the European Movement, who was quoted by the ST as saying that: "These are ominous findings for our foolish right-wing colleagues who think that there is a broad right-wing appeal. We cannot win the next election with other than a moderate centre approach."

MANOEUVRES FOR VOTES

Of course, to observers of the British political scene there is nothing new or extraordinary in the sight of politicians getting themselves worked up, not by the state of the nation and the policies responsible for it, but by the latest reading of the tea-leaves indicating their prospects of re-election. Politicians are in the habit of manoeuvring to the right, to the left and to the centre solely in accordance with how their antennae divine where the votes are to be won, and with hardly the smallest consideration for the overall needs of Britain. We may therefore take as par for the course the Tories' preoccupations with this latest opinion poll.

But is their interpretation of the poll even correct? Is it true that this legendary 'centre ground' of which Tories speak is where the sentiments of the vast bulk of the British public lie? Does the adoption of a soggy 'liberal' approach to the great issues provide the only possibility for a party, whether it be Tory, Labour or other, to win a general election? And is the Tories' current unpopularity due to their reputation for being 'too far to the right'? I would dispute these assumptions very strongly.

Taking the last assumption first, 'moderate' Tories, many of whom are grouped together under the 'One Nation' heading, flatter both themselves and their party if they think the public loathes them for ideological reasons. The party's currently low rating with the British people is above all due to its monumental incompetence and failure in government. Contrary to what 'One Nation' Tories and writers in the Sunday Times would like to believe, the majority of British voters are scarcely at all preoccupied with concepts of 'right', 'left' and 'centre' — in the rare cases where they understand what such terms actually mean. Much more germane to them are unemployment; inflation; Europe; VAT and other taxation; diminishing home values; the crime wave; the collapse of education and — though politicians and media pundits are reluctant to admit it — the immigration and ethnic minority breeding rates that are depriving them of large slices of their country. Of course, opinion polls commissioned by papers like the Sunday Times would have us believe otherwise, but since when have such polls ever provided reliable guides as to what people in the street really think?

WHAT IS 'RIGHT-WING'?

Quite apart from this, we should question, anyway, the definitions of 'right', 'left' and 'centre' as they are seen by today's news media and those in the political mainstream on whom they report. As an example, those who stand on the 'right' of the Tory Party tend to be the ones least in favour of interventionism in the economy and most supportive of letting market forces rule. They are the people who do not object when a foreign company buys up a large slice of an important British industry but hasten to assure us that this is just the way things are in a world economy in which national borders are a barrier to progress and efficiency. The same people do not regard it as an outrage when another British industry goes to the wall because it cannot compete with factories in East Asia where workers toil for one-fortieth the wages of those in Britain — or when the latter are thrown onto the scrapheap because investors in the City savour bigger profits by 'relocating' production in Singapore or the Philippines.

Our own British National Party is reputedly even further to the 'right' than the right wing of the Tories (are we not popularly referred to as 'right-wing extremists'?). By this yardstick we might be expected to take positions even further slanted towards free-market doctrine than those held by Tory free-marketeers. Yes this is far from the case. Our own policies on the economy favour a good deal of interventionism, involving as they do protection of British manufacturing and supervision of the movements of British investment capital. These policies, while remote from any current Tory thinking, are yet more so from the Tory 'right' than from the Tory 'left'. Does that make us left-wingers? I would hardly think so!

So could it not be that when Sunday Times opinion polls reveal that people questioned dislike the prospect of a Tory Party lurch to the 'right' what they are really telling us is that those people find a bitter taste in the medicine Tory Governments have been spooning out to them for the past 16 years and would be alarmed at the thought of that medicine being prescribed for the future in even stronger doses? Sane people in Britain can see that Tory economics have produced catastrophe, and they could therefore be forgiven for fearing that economic policies even more Tory than in the recent past will only produce yet greater catastrophe. I would submit that in this perception lies the finding that voters do not relish the Government moving still further to the 'right'. Who on earth would?

And what of the 'One Nation' concept favoured by so many mild and moderate people of the Tory left and centre but despised by the party's right-wing hard-liners? There is indeed nothing whatever wrong with this concept in principle. The principle is that the nation should be a mutually supportive community, an enlarged family in which the welfare of every member is the dutiful concern of every other member. One Nation Tories deplore national division, whether this be on the basis of inequality of economic opportunity between regions or resentment between differently favoured income groups. Against this, the Tory 'right' tends towards a philosophy of social Darwinism, in which competition and rivalry between the sections of society are seen as a desirable process for securing the survival of the fittest. Right-wing Tory thinking is based on the supposition that every individual is inherently selfish and greedy and that people's selfishness and greed, far from being curbed, should be encouraged as a means of generating greater energy, industry and competitiveness. The end product in the right-wing Tory scheme of things is atomisation. The nation is not a single and co-ordinated whole but just so many millions of individual units working against each other for private gain and profit. This rat-race is sanctified by means of the euphemistic and misleading slogan of 'freedom'.

THE NATIONALIST VIEW

Nationalist thinking is a synthesis of these potentially conflicting ideas. We do not ignore the selfish and egocentric urges that are present in every individual, particularly the more dynamic and achieving ones; they have to be recognised and encouraged but strictly within national and social bounds. We do not favour a society that is organised to serve the flabby and the unfit. At the same time we see the nation, in the last analysis, as a community in which the general good takes priority over the individual good, the rights of the race over the rights of the private person. This is a community in which duty and patriotism are demanded of individuals and rewards granted to those individuals in proportion to their practice of those virtues. The good of the nation and the good of each member of the nation, instead of being mutually antagonistic and conflicting in their pursuits, become complementary and indistinguishable.

One Nation Toryism has the weakness that it does not go far enough in recognising and encouraging the competitive urge in individuals, with the result that it fails to release the national energy needed for success in the wider world, and in that regard it comes close in affinity to welfare-state Socialism. Furthermore, its concept of what is meant by the 'nation' is fatally flawed. Any post-war immigrant or offspring thereof, if he resides within our borders, pays our taxes and is subject to our laws, is considered a member of this mythical 'nation', which has no identity in ethnic or cultural terms but is merely an aggregate of humans occupying the same living space. And precisely because this populace has none of the ingredients of nationhood in the true sense of that term, the mutual care and family spirit as envisaged in the Tory One Nation idea can never be effective within it.

We nationalists, by contrast, say: One Nation, yes — the British Nation as constituting members of the British Race! Let that be our community and our family, and let our obligations be to all within it and to none outside it. But let it be also a nation living in a bracing climate in which hard work and ability are rewarded and idleness and failure punished — always with the vital proviso that this nation is organised to provide work to all who genuinely seek it, something it cannot do under the terms favoured by the free-marketeering 'right-wingers' of today's Conservative Party and Government.

Talk of these needs to Mr. and Mrs. Public and you would, I suggest, meet with a very high level of agreement. Yet these are the ideas put forward by a party that is considered 'extreme' — and Mr. Temple-Morris has told us, has he not, that elections are not won by 'extremes' — presumably because British voters will not support such things!

THE RACE ISSUE

While we are on the subject of what the British people will and will not support, it is an opportune moment to take a look at another opinion poll, this time not one sponsored by the Sunday Times. On September 30th 1993, shortly following the British National Party's dramatic election victory in Tower Hamlets, the East London Advertiser (a paper which, incidentally, hates the BNP like poison) conducted its own survey as to the party's local support by means of a phone-in. From the calls received, a staggering 81 per cent declared in favour of the BNP. This of course was London's East End, and it is not suggested that that same percentage would have supported us in all other parts of the country. Nevertheless, polls conducted by other newspapers have established that opinions similar to those of our party on racial matters are held by an overwhelming majority — even though not all would go quite as far — yet — as we do in the matter of solutions. The Daily Express, in August this year, reported a survey on race which found that most people favoured non-Whites being given taxpayers' cash to return to their countries of origin and that a party supporting repatriation of those same non-Whites would be "on course to becoming Britain's third political force, ahead of the Liberals." These findings were obtained quite separately from other issues, such as Capital Punishment and Europe, on which a very large percentage of the electorate, probably the majority, holds opinions closer to those of the BNP than to any of the major parties. Had the BNP's policies on repatriation of immigrants been presented by the Daily Express pollsters as part of a policy package incorporating its views on these other issues, the probable result of the poll would have been a consensus in favour of our party much higher than that which merely put us ahead of the LibDems.

Europe is indeed an issue on which Tory 'moderates' have been expressing grave concern that the 'Euro-Sceptic' lobby may be pushing the party towards the 'extremes'. In other words, if you are 'Euro-Sceptic' you are 'extreme right'. Considering that one opinion poll after another has established that a substantial majority of the British people are 'Euro-Sceptic', does this not suggest that the electorate stands on the 'extreme right' — according to the 'moderate' Tory definition of the term? We are now moving into the realm of the nonsensical and the farcical, but that is where 'moderate' Tory reasoning takes us once we accept its premises.

SOURCE OF LABOUR'S SUPPORT

As fallacious as these assumptions about 'right-wing extremism' held by so many in the Tory Party is the idea that Labour's current honeymoon with the voters is due to its having captured the so-called 'centre ground'. It is due to no such thing — or at least not in the sense that Tories understand the term. More and more people are supporting Labour for the precise same reason as fewer and fewer are supporting the Tories: the incompetence and failure of the Tory Government. Labour is the receptacle of the support that is deserting the Tories essentially because Labour provides the best — indeed at present the only — means by which the Tory Government can be hounded out of office. Of course Labour is benefiting from the public presumption (albeit a quite false one) that it has neutralised its extreme left. But that does not prove that the British people dislike 'extremism', only that they dislike left-wing extremism — a very different thing. Unlike the so-called 'extremism' of the right, this extremism does not repel merely by virtue of its own usage as a trigger-word; it is rejected because the public has a clear perception of what it means in terms of actual politics. Left-wing extremism is seen as trade union militancy gone mad; as education in the hands of dotty permissives who cannot teach the 3 'Rs'; as sympathy with the IRA and worship of Gerry Adams; as rioting mobs in the streets pelting police with missiles and burning Union Jacks; as wholesale nationalisation of industries as enshrined in Clause Four; as hairy students occupying campuses in solidarity with university folk heroes such as Winston Silcott; as Dennis Skinner ranting in the House of Commons against the 'capitalist class' and Tony Benn marching in the streets in favour of Argentine ownership of the Falklands. The British people have seen these phenomena in good measure and they do not like what they have seen. Left-wing extremism has a precise connotation that is widely understood. 'Right-wing extremism' is merely a piece of political jargon which, once it is stripped of its semantic hypnosis and identified with specific policies and ideas which meet with widespread public sympathy, quickly loses its capacity to frighten and hence its utility as a term of abuse. True, if people see 'right-wing extremism' as meaning more of the economic free-for-all that has wrecked British industry and created mass unemployment they will reject it for that reason; but if they identify it with stout patriotism and a policy of 'Britain Free' and 'Britain First' they will embrace it, whatever name its opponents colour it with.

In other words, the Tory centre and left, the Macleod group and the One Nation lobby, together with the other elements in that party who would align Conservatism with a flaccid liberalism, have got it all wrong. They are wrong about the policies needed for Britain and they are wrong about the policies the British people want. But after all these years of government shambles and muddle should we have expected otherwise?

THE INTERNET

TONY LECOMBER LOOKS AT SOME OF THE POLITICAL & CENSORIAL ASPECTS INVOLVED

AS most readers are now aware, the BNP is on the Internet! Everyone in the party can be rightly proud and pleased with this advance since, although it might not be obvious now, the Internet — a network of computers, holding information and news on anything and everything — is the most significant political development since the advent of television.

Establishment politics, its access to propaganda media (and its denial of those media to others) and its attendant impact on the mass of the people by way of press, radio and, most recently and importantly, of television, are completely intertwined. This has given the establishment a complete stranglehold on power.

Years ago, most people in Britain relied on the press for their main source of news information. Today it is TV.

The significance of the Internet for us is primarily as a rival news and propaganda medium to television. A medium in which the BNP has unrestricted access and is able to address a large and growing audience, uncensored and on equal terms with the other parties.

Believe it or not, the Internet — the much touted information superhighway — despite all the recent interest surrounding it, is now some 25 years old. The Internet was originally developed from military research — the US Defence Department wanted to create a communications network using different types of equipment that would still work in times of crisis, even if parts of the network failed or were damaged, in other words, it was to be invulnerable to single-point failures.

It has fulfilled this task only too well, because today various parties, primarily in America, are calling for the imposition of the most stringent censorship this century.

The reason for this is that the Internet has grown uncontrolled, like an amorphous jellyfish. It has no centre and there is no way for government of shutting out what it doesn't like to see. The interlocking net of thousands of computers (Servers) means that shutting down one provider of service (dialled up by thousands of users) is of little use since: (a) The service-provider can simply set up shop somewhere else — anywhere else in fact: Albania, China, or Libya, for example, where regulation may not be so stringent and the offending service will, through a multitude of routes, leak back into the country; and: (b) If something is banned in one country, you can simply access it from another very easily — as easily as making a telephone call in fact. The implication here is that in practical terms, regardless of legislation, censorship is reduced to the lowest common denominator, in other words, none!

A LEVEL PLAYING FIELD

The lack of centralisation and lack of control means that the 'little guy' has a chance to compete with the biggest in the world. Thus small high-tech companies are doing very well on the Net and putting the giant corporations to shame while earning increasing amounts of money. Similarly, small pressure groups and political parties can air their views on exactly the same level as the major players. Thus the British National Party can for instance compete on the Internet on equal terms with either Labour or the Tories. Even so, all of this wouldn't matter if the target audience on the Net were tiny or insignificant. But the Net in Britain, already reaching hundreds of thousands, is just lifting off, and the party will soon reach a UK audience of millions. This is the reason why BNP press officer Michael Newland was asked by news media earlier in the year whether the BNP had plans to get on the Net. Now that the party is on the Net, Channel Four — the discredited anti-British TV propaganda and hate outlet — has already started to gnash its teeth with impotent fury.

Until just five years ago, however, the user base was small and there was very little private use, the Internet being confined to universities for information swapping and to business for E-mail — the electronic mailing system. But the coincidence of falling hardware prices, both for computers and for modems (connecting the computer to the telephone), and the advent of burgeoning service-providers to the Internet, has seen the Net really take off as the general public has jumped onto the roller coaster.

The appeal of the Internet is its lack of structure; it connects to every other online service of any consequence, so that by achieving Internet access you can talk to the rest of the online world. Thus geographically widely scattered people sharing a common interest can be in constant touch with each other. The Net combines the immediacy of the phone but with local call rates to anywhere in the world and in a way which enables the sharing of masses of written information between like-minded people or the searching of huge online libraries for research/reading or retrieval without leaving your home. As such, the Net is now the biggest source of information on anything you might care to name anywhere in the world.

THE AMERICAN PIONEERS

With their head-start in the private use of computers, it isn't hard to see why American patriots were the first to pioneer the nationalist use of the Internet. Scattered as they are over an entire continent, the Net has given nationalists in America both a focus and an outlet for their ideas. Indeed, the dissemination of ideas at an academic level was one of the first ever uses of the Net between universities.

Here in Britain, the use of the Net as a focus is, I think, going to be largely a peripheral one. The most important aspect for us is the dissemination of ideas and news. Currently, UK Net users number well under a million. But with the launch of the new Windows 95 product from Microsoft, which includes its own Net-launcher, the number of people using the Net is growing at several thousand per week. Market forces are, of themselves, going to give the UK a user base of some five million in just two or three years time, that is to say all private users plus all those with Net access from libraries, schools and universities, which are all scheduled to be on the Net within the next year or so.

At the moment, the typical American Net user (no figures are available for the UK) is either a student/academic with a university account, a computer/high-tech industry worker or a white (80%), male (60%), middle-class graduate (60%) with a private dial-up connection to a service-provider. Income is above the national average and politics are right of centre (it is very likely that UK figures are similar but with a higher proportion of whites). Quite frankly, these are exactly the sort of people the party needs to reach if it is to broaden its appeal and win support beyond the inner cities.

In a couple of years time, many more people will be on the Net and Net users will prove to be more of a cross-section of society. This is all to the good — the more, the merrier! We will reach them all, if they are in the least politically conscious. Anyone with an interest in politics will home in on the politics page, whether they be of the left, right or centre. When they see the entry for the British National Party, they will look us up, even if they don't necessarily agree with us, just to see what we've got to say for ourselves. And they can do this in the strict privacy of their own homes. It involves no commitment and it is strictly private — no one else is looking over their shoulder. This point cannot be stressed too much since we all know that the unhealthily oppressive political atmosphere in Britain stifles debate and free speech by the fear of official disapproval and the attending consequences to job or career, and this is particularly true of the typical Net user. The point though here is that by these people seeing what we have got to say for ourselves, the party will break through the carefully contrived censorship that does exist in this country but pretends that it doesn't! Hundreds, then thousands, of people will see for themselves that the BNP is a sensible, serious party offering sober analysis and solutions to their problems and the problems of the country, and that contrary to the media portrayal of racial nationalists we are neither wild-eyed loons, nor race-haters, nor drooling over the prospect of another holocaust.

Unlike in America, we in Britain have had to live with the repressive Race Relations laws for some twenty years. While these are an intolerable restriction on the freedom of speech, they have also, paradoxically, turned out to be of benefit whereby nationalist language has had to be couched in more moderate, polite and therefore more persuasive terms. This is a happy turn of events, since a look at American patriotic Net content shows that much of it is rather negative, couched in strong language to the point of a rant; not all of it of course, but the tendency is there and cannot reflect too well

A diagrammatical representation of the Internet

The Internet is a network of computer servers with links directly or indirectly to all the others on the Net. Breaking one link, from 'a' to 'd' for example is overcome by routing through 'b' or 'e' or indeed any combination of the others. Each server or service-provider would in turn be linked by a dial up connection to hundreds and thousands of computer users all 'surfing the Net.'

on the groups concerned. 'Like attracts like' is a very true observation and we need to attract everyday people who are concerned for their country with patriotic inclinations, not Hollywood Nazis or big-talking drinkers. A mass movement is made up of the people, not a small section of it or a cult. And the BNP, nothing if not ambitious, is aiming for massive growth and expansion.

Thus for the reasons of the audience that the Net provides the BNP, which is going to get much larger, and because the Net gives the BNP equal terms with our opponents, elements surrounding government are anxious to seek ways of control and censorship. Of course, no 'democratic' government is going to come out and say so though. So the first step is to get its big governmental foot in the door, and this will come by attacking on two fronts. The first of these is pornography and the second is encryption technology.

WARNING FROM AMERICA

At this point we must turn to America, which is several years ahead of us in this regard. The point is that if precedent is set to legislate to restrict what can be accessed on the Net, then government can legislate to restrict anything. In America there is pressure for legislation to ban pornography on the Net. This pressure is coming from right-wing Christians and Republicans looking for a cause prior to their elections a little over a year away. Now this is all rather disingenuous of the morality brigade since: (a) As discussed earlier, the Net is fundamentally impossible to legislate against as regards censorship; and: (b) The law covering pornography under the US constitution, while rather vague, does also apply to the Net — most of which is the sort of stuff available on the top shelves of newsagents.

Nevertheless, by three dubious contrivances, the Christian Coalition, a pro-family organisation with 1.6 million supporters and several Republican US Senators, is gearing up to get censorship controls over the Net, using the first point of attack — pornography.

First, they claim that since children can access a computer — their father's possibly — children are exposed to porn! But this ignores the fact that the child would have to key in dad's credit-card number to achieve access (nothing is for free), or have dad's help! But in any case, the Net is for serious adult discussions. Why should adult arguments or any other material be censored to a level that would not offend a five-year-old, particularly when children are still in a very small minority? (People can be very rude to each other on the Net).

Second, one practitioner of deceit, a Senator Grassley, seized on a study by the Carnegie Mellon University which was looking at Net porn. On one particular pornographic bulletin board (BBS) were found a number of pictures. Apparently, no less than 83.5 per cent of 917,410 pictures on this pornographic BBS were sexually explicit! Now you might well, without in anyway condoning porn, say: "Well, what did he expect?" But that would miss the mark, because Senator Grassley went on to cause a national furore by implying that 83.5 per cent of all Net content was pornographic. Time magazine which carried the story, later recanted in public, saying that the story was gravely flawed. But the damage had of course been done. In fact, less than 0.5 per cent of Net content by byte count is pornographic, and that is a huge over-estimate since images of any kind are more byte-heavy, as it were, than text. The real porn content is probably less than 0.08 per cent.

Third, the pro-censorship lobby are counting on the likelihood that few people will be willing to stand up and defend the right to purvey pornography in public. Who, after all, wishes to ally themselves with the dirty raincoat brigade or even that sick band of perverts who specialise in child porn? Even so, this ignores the fact that supplying child pornography is already an offence in US (and British) law.

Clearly, by deliberate misinterpretation of statistics and conjuring up an image of innocent kiddies on the Net who are largely not there, and then attacking an easy target, with few defenders and which in any case is: (a) greatly over-exaggerated and: (b) already legislated for, the door is swinging open to draconian levels of censorship. Because to make censorship stick, given the available technology which militates against it, such censorship would have to be oppressively heavy handed. Furthermore, it would in practice only partially effect the users, since the purveyors of such material could place it on the Net outside any given national boundary as discussed earlier, and the users could still obtain the material from outside those national boundaries. Therefore, the people pressing for censorship either don't know what they're talking about or there is a hidden agenda afoot. Nevertheless, such censorship if more widely applied would affect purely national groups since such a group could scarcely place material advertising its organisation on the Net outside national boundaries while at the same time trying to operate on a legitimate basis inside those national boundaries. At this point, all readers will have seen the significance of the proposed censorship. While it would be totally ineffective against porn, the precedent would have been set which, if it were applied to a party political group, would be absolutely effective.

The second point of attack is encryption technology. In the US, encryption technology is classified as a munition and cannot be exported. One Mr. Zimmerman is currently facing ruin for placing on the Net an encryption program called Pretty good privacy, or PGP. PGP is a breakthrough for encryption technology since the highly complex coding and decoding algorithms have been separated. This means that a person A who wishes to communicate securely with persons B and C, for example, without person D listening in, can now do so using military grade encryptions technology. Using PGP over the Net, person A can advertise his public encryption key for anybody to encrypt a message to him. But only person A can decode the message with his own private decryption key. This arrangement has revolutionised encryption (which has traditionally used just one encryption/decryption key and which suffered from possible interception of the key itself from person A to person B or C by person D — who having obtained the key could then read all encoded traffic) and made it publicly available over the Net, giving Joe Public uncrackable coded communications.

This time, the enemies of free speech come from the left as well as the right — Stalinists, paranoids and anti-democrats who don't like the idea of not knowing what their own citizens are saying or doing. They say that the intelligence services need to be able to decode Net material to guard against terrorists and drug-traffickers, etc., having uncrackable communications. The ordinary citizen has nothing to fear, so they say. But why shouldn't any citizen have complete privacy from the prying eyes of the State? Why should his tax affairs, interests, hobbies, love-life, political opinions and much else besides become subject to the general nosiness of the intrusive State?

U.K. STATE HARASSMENT

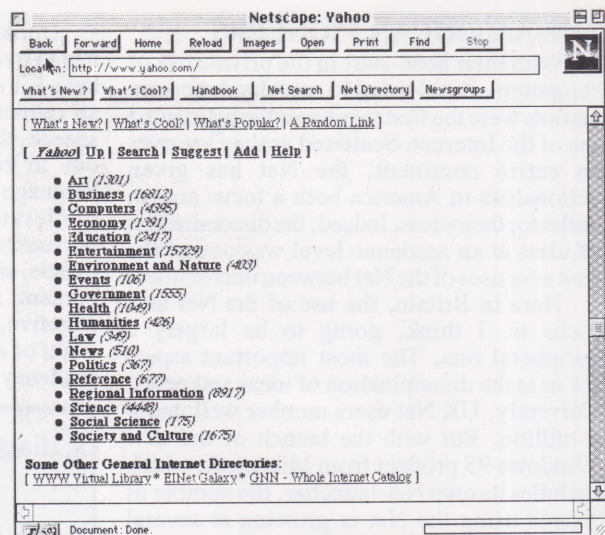

A recent case here in Britain involved the arrest of a bulletin board operator in Scotland. The BBS in question had archived material from an American Anarchist group which advocated anti-government violence. Grounds for arrest, possibly, but what else? The fact that anyone could, if they wished to, access the material from America rather than a local operator means that the horse has long since bolted and the stable door is wide open. If the operator concerned was only archiving such material (the British Library is also certain to have this material for reference) and that was the sole cause of arrest, then, much as we might disagree with anarchists, quite frankly such arrest can be viewed as little more than political harassment, since the only alternative standpoint is to say that the mere archiving of such material on the Net does indicate promotion and that laws should be passed against it, irrespective of the fact that such laws would be totally unenforceable and anyone could obtain the material quite easily elsewhere. This is actually quite a deep philosophical argument and an emotive one, since the same arguments could be made with respect to child porn for example.

NATIONALISTS MUST LEAD THE FIGHT AGAINST SUPPRESSION OF FREE SPEECH

Readers might be interested to know that the Labour Party has appointed Chris Smith MP as Shadow Minister for the information superhighway. No prizes for guessing which side he's on! And of course, as nationalists in Britain know only too well, unlike in America, we have no bill of rights protecting freedom of speech. In fact there's precious little freedom at all, so the censorship threat is all the greater.

All freedom-loving nationalists are on the side of free speech against the so-called democrats, who wish to curtail our liberties. Ironical, isn't it? Still, if they are to curb freedoms, they will have to be seen to do so and the British National Party could well win some excellent publicity, particularly with regard to encryption technology and the question of censorship in general. As discussed earlier, BNP Net content is both serious and persuasively and politely argued without in any way losing the hard substantial edge of racial nationalism. This will make it more difficult for the powers that be in their quest for totalitarian suppression and control of thought and ideas. Another plus for the party is that we are on the Net now — giving us time to be noticed and accepted by the Net community as a part of the established scenery. Indeed, independent web pages specialising in politics have already included links to our own home page. In other words, someone looking at another web-site clicks onto a link to the BNP and immediately finds themselves in our home page. In this regard it is also important to recognise the freedom-inclined ethos of the Net and of those that use it — a worthy tradition that the world of British politics could well take note of!

The Internet is so vast that most first-time users are well advised to use a big Web index system like Yahoo which contains a, by no means exhaustive, list of 30,000 entries through a hierarchical index.

In the meantime, the BNP has one of the most exciting political home pages around. It is well presented and the content has been intelligently thought out. There is still room for improvement of course. A few colour graphic images wouldn't go amiss, for example, although this should be resolved shortly in the new year. At the same time, the party is currently developing a second site, with links to the first to advertise the books sold by the BNP Book Service and also other BNP merchandising for all who want it. The British National Party News Service featuring a condensed version of British Nationalist and carrying a library of the best Spearhead articles over the last year can be found by dialling up:-

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, we have found it impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle our magazine. It is therefore not to be found on sale in high street newsagents or bookshops. Hence our need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to: Spearhead c/o PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested, in which case an SAE would be much appreciated.

WHERE ULSTER UNIONISTS ARE GOING WRONG

A look behind the flags and parades
by ANDREW BOWYER

A cornerstone of British Nationalism is the unity of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. This unity of our nation means more than simply a collection of geographical entities, but the common heritage and traditions of its component peoples.

The importance of the maintenance of the United Kingdom has largely been lost on the three main parties at Westminster. Labour and the Lib-Dems openly favour a United Ireland solution to the current troubles in Ulster, whilst the Tories' claim to be the party of Unionism, is contradicted by its shameful record over the past twenty-five years of pursuing policies which are ultimately aimed at easing Northern Ireland out of the Kingdom.

Only two parties at Westminster presently seek to uphold Ulster's position within the UK. They are the Ulster Unionist Party, led by the newly elected David Trimble, and Ian Paisley's Democratic Unionist Party. The DUP emerged from a split in Ulster Unionism in 1970 and, despite Paisley's high profile, is only a bit-player in Northern Irish politics. The Ulster Unionist Party, also known as the Official Unionists, is by far the largest recipient of the unionist vote.

The UUP was born out of the Ulster Unionist Council of 1905, which itself originated from the Liberal and Conservative Unionist Parties, which fought against Gladstone's Home Rule Bill of the 1880s. For over seventy years after partition in 1921, the Ulster Unionist Party has represented the British link with Ireland. But the question must be asked: exactly why are the UUP so eager to remain British? What aspect of Britishness do the leaders of this party empathise with?

There can of course be no doubt about the depth of feeling towards Britain held within the ordinary Ulsterman, but here, we are concerned with what motivates the leaders of the Official Unionist Party in their desire to reject the Republic of Ireland and embrace the United Kingdom.

An answer to our question can be found in the 'Ulster Unionist Information Institute' newsletter of October 1994. In an article entitled 'Northern Ireland - a haven for all', the Rev Martin Smyth, MP for South Belfast, reports on how welcome Third World immigrants are to Northern Ireland and how they will "...become part of our Ulster mosaic." Further on Mr Smyth gleefully recounts how privileged he was to be the inaugurating officer at the first annual meeting of the Northern Ireland Filipino Society! All sounds depressingly familiar, does it not?

The UUP's commitment to multi-racialism does not stop at Filipino Societies. In 'a blueprint for stability' (Unionist Voice, February 1994) the Ulster Unionist Party embraces the Charter of Paris (1990), which states: - "We affirm that the ethnic, cultural, linguistic and religious identity of national minorities will be protected and that persons belonging to national minorities have the right to freely express, preserve and develop that identity Without discrimination and in full equality before the law" (emphasis added).

Here we see a glaring contradiction between what the party publicly proclaims in its pro-British pronouncements and the vision of Ulster it would really wish to see implemented.

IRRECONCILABLE

Simply, how does one reconcile the desire to "preserve the British identity of Ulster" of the party's manifesto with the commitment to "preserve and develop" the identity of ethnic minorities?

These examples show us in what direction the UUP wishes to see any future Ulster develop. The motivations of Ulster Unionism leadership can be summed up in the words of Arlene Kelly, Chairman of the Ulster Young Unionist Council, who writing in the forward of the booklet Irish Kulturkampf (Arthur Aughey, February 1995) states:-

UNIONISTS ON THE MARCH
A parade of Orangemen. Are they loyal to the right things?

"It is clear that one of the most positive aspects of belonging to the United Kingdom is the cultural diversity that exists within it, as compared to notions of cultural supremacy present in the Republic of Ireland."

Arthur Aughey, the author of the booklet, notes that Unionism is not a totalising way of life but "...as a political entity it has room for any manner of cultural expressions." He goes on to indicate that the ideal of Unionism is the political identity which is comfortable within a multicultural society, whilst Irish Nationalism is only content with promoting one culture, i.e. that of Gaelic/Irish.

These statements betray the reality surrounding what not only draws the Ulster Unionist Party towards Britain but more importantly, what repels it about the Irish Republic.

Notwithstanding our hostility towards Irish Nationalism (more accurately Irish separatism) vis-a-vis Northern Ireland, we as British Nationalists, recognise the importance of cultural exclusiveness in any national/racial grouping if it is to retain an identity and therefore a sense of purpose. It is the Republican movement's ability to capitalise upon these sentiments which partly explains why it has made such headway in the battle for hearts and minds amongst ordinary, if naive, Irishmen, especially those of Irish descent in the USA.

In comparison, the Unionist leadership is inextricably wedded to the diseased world of multi-racial liberalism and cultural pluralism. Does the common Ulsterman seriously hold these notions dear to his heart? Is this what many brave members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and RUC have sacrificed their lives for? To have fought back the encroachments of Irish Nationalism only to see their country subverted through the back door?

ANTI-B.N.P.

However, the failure of modern-day unionism is not confined to its misguided patriotism but also in its failure to recognise the reality of the shift in power in British politics.

Following Derek Beackon's election victory in September 1993, the Ulster Unionist Party, alongside other established parties, issued prompt condemnations of the British National Party — one spokesman even calling for the party's proscription!

The UUP's commitment to multi-culturalism and its desire to impose it upon Ulster unfortunately made it inevitable that it would be hostile to the BNP. But this only serves to demonstrate the Unionist leadership's incomprehension of the

LINDA MILLER asks...

RACIAL HATRED: WHO ARE THE GUILTY ONES?

IT IS about time that we responded to those who accuse BNP supporters of 'racial hatred' by throwing the accusation straight back in their faces. They are the race haters; we are the race lovers.

The law states, very ambiguously, that it is an offence to incite racial hatred. If this law means what it says, then it takes no effort to point out directly, and without twisting things at all, that it is the people who seek to deny the existence of race, the importance of race and the valuable aspects of different races who are guilty of the charge of incitement to racial hatred.

So-called 'white extremists', as race-haters term us, do not hate other races. For example, the Ku Klux Klan support the 'black extremists' led by Louis Farrakhan. They are the best of friends in the ideological sense. What both groups do hate are those who deny race - the race-haters. We assert that people should live in their own country, amongst their own people, and be proud of who they are. We oppose multi-culturalism and cosmopolitanism precisely because we love our race and we recognise the separateness and 'differentness' of other races, as Nature has intended. To be forcibly deprived a positive racial identity, and to have your race constantly and viciously blamed for all the ills of the world, is criminal. Anyone guilty of this crime should be charged with incitement to racial hatred.

It is completely contradictory for this law to be used against the very people who, more than anyone else in the world, love their race and wish all other races to feel similarly about themselves. We wish all people to celebrate this love of biological difference from other people by breeding true to their own racial characteristics and becoming ever more divergent. The real race-haters, deliberately and falsely, insist that if we love our race it implies that we must hate other races. This is as stupid as saying that if you love your husband or wife then you must hate all other members of the opposite sex. Or, if you love your family, you must hate all other families. This latter is a very close analogy to the race issue, as your family is, like your race, your own blood and kin.

DIFFERENT RACES: NO HATE

On left: an elder of the Mbaiki tribe in Central Africa; on right: a Norwegian naval commander. Each has his own distinct racial character and inhabits his own living space. As long as these distinctions are preserved, the races can live in peace with one another.

Certainly your first loyalty is naturally to your kin, but this does not translate into hatred of others because they are different. Some such aggressive feeling is only natural if others are behaving in a manner which could be harmful to your own kin, such as infringing on your resources and living space and destroying the genetic base of your genepool.

If the alien race, on the other hand, keeps to its own habitat and stays completely separate, then we have no reason to hate them or give them a second's thought.

THOSE WHOM WE SHOULD HATE

All our much vaunted hatred is directed against those who hate race, no matter which race they are from, because they stand in the way of our deep love and loyalty towards our own race. Many of these race-haters are from the White race.

The race-hate brigade (who wield such a tyrannical power in this so-called democracy) contains third-rate 'scientists', who receive publicity far in excess of their due. Usually scruffy, cringing little men in appearance, they devote their careers to the ridiculous pursuit of devising a scientific argument (yet an argument which contains little logic nor correct analysis of evidence) that biological racial differences are non-existent beyond a superficial variation in skin shade.

Many Whites insanely prefer to believe this kind of schizophrenic nonsense than to be convinced by a purely rational analysis of facts, which as anyone can immediately notice, in no way begin to resemble the delusions these creatures peddle. They know it is all make-believe themselves, but their race-hatred drives them to oppose their own kind.

In fact, most of the other races tend to be proud of their own identity and origins, whilst Whites, who have been targeted by relentless race-hating propaganda, are ashamed of being White.

Race-hating propaganda is extremely libellous, consisting of such ridiculous accusations as that the white race is eternally guilty of having enslaved Blacks. In truth, members of 'the race that must not be named' were some of the worst slave traders, and they are also the originators of many of these false accusations against Whites. In addition, slavery by African tribes on other African tribes was going on long before they were taken as slaves to White countries.

Manufactured guilt over slavery has been used as a stick to beat whites into accepting all manner of idiocies. The 'Holocaust' is another such big stick. All whites must forever be guilty of gassing six million Jews. It is never pointed out by the media, which regularly beats us with this particular stick that there have been many holocausts throughout history (which are not disputed) and Whites are no more to blame for taking part in some of these massacres than are other groups.

We are made to feel guilty for technological advances that have incidentally polluted the planet. In reality, this pollution, which does indeed threaten the whole future of life on this planet, is not of our doing. It is fuelled by the internationalist greed of a tiny minority, which controls most of the world's economic resources. The race-haters insist that we have a moral duty to develop and to use our technology in order to 'help' people all over the world. This 'help' is not even welcomed by other races, who, quite rightly see it as harmful, arrogant interference by aliens, who do not share their values and are attempting to foist a universal decadent culture onto them. They are correct to resent this. They should, like us, direct their anger against the race-haters who are destroying them.

WHITES ARE AN ENDANGERED SPECIES

Our white race is a threatened and endangered species. If we do not protect ourselves against mongrelisation and down breeding of our healthy and intelligent element, we are surely doomed to extinction. There is nothing aggressive about the desire to ensure that there are white people on Earth long into the future. This is no more than conservation. We wish to protect our people and protect our planet. This is love. The race-haters poison and destroy life as they cover the Earth in concrete, driven by a deep abhorrence of all things natural. They are bitter, twisted, psychopathic people. They find beauty revolting and they revel in ugliness.

The most beautiful people among mankind are the archetypal examples of their race, sub-race or tribe. This is the ideal to which all natural humans strive. Nature desires complete speciation, the complete separation of different breeding groups. In time, natural selection, the driving force of evolution, erases all the blurred edges between populations. Distinct types results and purity results. A purity which the race-haters are determined to prevent and to pollute.

ASSAULT ON THE ANIMAL KINGDOM

Not satisfied with polluting biological strains of humans, the race-haters are now even applying their ignorant philosophy to animals.

In a documentary recently shown on television some zoologists had closely observed the genetic make up of cheetahs in a zoo, and were alarmed by the fact that each cat's genes varied so little from another's (This was not only in the zoo population, but also in the wild). Nature had perfected these creatures to astoundingly fine detail. They were meticulously evolved to survive in their particular environmental niche.

In order to breed cheetahs in the zoo, the zoologists decided to cross the most genetically divergent individuals they could find. This, they hoped, would increase the animals' fertility and their resistance to disease.

Also in this documentary they observed the genetics of two separate wild breeding groups of Rhinoceros. One grouped in Southern Sahara and the other in former Rhodesia. It was considered that if these two groups were crossed this would also improve their fertility and disease resistance.

However, a scientist subsequently noticed that each group had subtle genetic differences. He speculated that if they were crossed the result could well be the extinction of both populations.

If we consider horse-breeding, we can see what has happened when sub-species of horse have been crossbred.

The original European horse evolved at the western end of the Steppe Belt that stretches from the Ukraine to Mongolia. From this western horse, about ten thousand years ago, evolved the large forest and swamp horse, from which Shire horses are descended. Also from this horse evolved a smaller pony, which was probably the first to be domesticated six thousand years ago. We should take special note of this European pony. It is noted for its fifth horse-riding gait, which no other ancient and natural breed has. The fifth gait is called a tolt. We know that both the Romans and Ancient Greeks had this

Remember the BNP in your will!

We wish all our readers a long life, but none of us can stay on this earth for ever. Have you ever thought about how you can help the cause when you are gone?

The British National Party has benefitted immensely from a few of its supporters remembering the party in their wills. In most cases the money has been invested so as to guarantee the party a regular income, rather than being spent in one go.

Why not become one of these benefactors yourself? Whatever you do, make sure you do not die intestate and let your estate go to prop up the political system!

It is natural that if you have a family you should wish to provide for it in the event of your death, but nevertheless you may well like to set aside something for the good cause as well. On the other hand, if you have no next of kin there is all the more reason for ensuring that the cause gets something before you go.

If you want advice on this matter, please ring or write in and let us know.

American leader banned from UK

Upon Dr. William Pierce's return home after his speech to the British National Party rally in London last month, he received a letter from Britain's Immigration & Nationality Department, part of which read as follows:-

Dear Sir,

I am writing to inform you that the Home Secretary is minded to direct personally that you be excluded from the United Kingdom on the grounds that your presence here would not be conducive to the public good for reasons of public order and community relations.

Accordingly, you should not travel to the United Kingdom until consideration has been given to any representations you may make, because you are otherwise likely to be refused admission to this country...

Dr. Pierce is a man of good character and has never broken the law. He is a friend of this country, and no violation of public order occurred during his recent visit. Contrast his treatment with that of black American trouble-maker Al Sharpton, who after helping to instigate a riot in the UK was subsequently allowed in again; with several American IRA supporters who have been admitted without qualm; and with heaven knows how many thousands of illegal immigrants!

NOVEMBER 12th: A THOUGHT FROM THE CENOTAPH

"Remembrance day is a special day for me — it's the only day I can walk the London streets with no fear of being mugged!"

EDUCATION FOR LIFE (Part 1)

In the first part of a two-part article Dr. DONALD STEVENS takes a look at what is wrong with modern teaching methods

EDUCATION is a preparation for life.

This is a truism that has been accepted by all educationalists throughout all ages. However, it has always been a matter of prime importance to decide what 'life' means. Our present blinkered government, has begged the issue (like so many other issues) and assumed that 'life' is that life which lies within the frontiers of its petty, narrow money obsessed outlook. The very name of the Department of Education and Science betrays the government's total lack of interest in the Arts and Religion. Even Science, in its limited thinking, really means Technology: the ability to make and use machines; and Commerce, the pseudo-science which is concerned with making money. Therefore, the government has assumed that 'life' means 'working-life', thereby ignoring two facts: firstly, that nowadays leisure occupies more time than work, and secondly, that we have more unemployed than ever before. In view of this, it is ironical that the present head of the Department of Education appears to be also the head of the Department of Employment, and that Education is synonymous with Employment. Given the mental level of our present parliamentarians, I would not be surprised if the government thinks (to use the term only very loosely) that they mean the same because they both begin with 'E'.

With this emphasis in Education on what will promote money-making, the government is satisfied. The larger issues are handed over to the self-proclaimed intellectuals of the Left, who also are not interested in the Arts — and certainly not in Religion. Thus; while Science is limited to Technology and Commerce; Art, Music, Literature, Languages, Religion, and History are dominated by the Left. Three examples will suffice.

Some years ago, a colleague had occasion to visit the office of a minor official of the British Arts Council; the wall was decorated with — not a reproduction of a British masterpiece by Gainsborough or Constable or Alan Ramsay — but by a huge photograph of Chairman Mao. More recently, I applied for a post to teach French in a local sixth-form college; I was informed by a Pakistani (who did not speak French) that, if successful, I would, in my French lessons teach two subjects: Ecology and 'Racism'; not Racine or Molière or Lamartine or Anouilh, not French culture or history, but Animal-Rights ecology and left-wing militant multi-culture. This state of affairs has been with us for a long time. The 'poet' Auden was in Barcelona actively supporting the Republicans in the Spanish Civil War; he was arrested for an act of indecency in a public park, and he was released when it was discovered that he had in his pocket a letter from the head of the British Communist Party; after running away to America when he thought that things were not safe, he returned to Britain to take up a post as Professor of Poetry at the University of Oxford'.

WHAT IS EDUCATION?

Let us leave, for a moment, this illegitimate warped mutant spawned by our Lib/Lab/Con masters, and consider Education in its true sense.

Education is for life; but life is not all work, and not all work is concerned solely with the making of money. It is true that there are classes for other things besides the working life, but these are primarily aimed at those about to retire, when it is too late to re-awaken the interests smothered under a monetarist life of grab. Besides, this is too limited a view: that one large part of Education is only for those who are no longer commercially useful. If Education is for the whole man and woman, it must begin in childhood, even in babyhood. If Art, Music, Literature, Religion, and History are valuable, their value must be made evident to all from the youngest to the oldest.

Education is for the enrichment of life. It should make people better at work, at play, in character and in morality, Efficiency and moral rectitude are two very great assets to any civilisation, but they are not all. One can have a limited efficiency and a narrow morality, as in our present society: we stress efficiency in commerce and sport — without attaining it; we punish murder but permit perversion. We enrich the successful, but only with money; we miss the thousand-and-one other riches that life has to offer because we are educated to appreciate only the one form of wealth that a monetarist society can offer.

Each person is born with certain categories of receptivity. These classify, accept and reject the events that life brings to the person. These categories of receptivity accept the classifiable, and reject the unclassifiable. They vary enormously: they vary from race to race, from culture to culture, from nationality to nationality, from person to person, not only in what they accept and reject, but also how they classify.

In their simplest form, these categories of receptivity are best thought of as receptacles: bowls that can receive different liquids, one liquid per bowl; pockets into each of which only one kind of coin can be put; niches into which only furniture of a certain shape will fit.

A person blind from birth has no true concept of colour, because he lacks the receptacle called colour. A person who is truly tone-deaf (and not simply musically illiterate) cannot appreciate music, because he cannot distinguish between one note and another, and cannot even tell when one sound is higher or lower than another. A person whose sense of smell is deficient cannot take pleasure in the scent of flowers. These are physical limitations. More common are mental limitations.

Where there is no receptacle, we cannot receive an event. However, when an event cannot be received, the mind attempts to fit it into what receptacles are available to it. When the Greek writer Herodotus wanted to describe falling snow to the Greeks, there was no receptacle in their mind for this phenomenon: they had never seen or felt it. Therefore, he had to find suitable receptacles: so he described this strange thing, for which the Greeks had no word, as cold feathers falling from the sky. The Greeks had receptacles for 'cold', 'feathers', and 'sky'. Intelligent Greeks could combine these receptacles and so receive the concept of 'snow'. This is a basic part of education, the creation of new receptacles. Quite different was the experience of St. John the Divine on the Island of Patmos: "I saw" as it were, "a sea of glass mingled with fire."² Herodotus had experienced snow; he was trying to explain it to people who had not. St. John experienced something that he himself did not understand. Nevertheless, he used the same method as the Greek: St. John knew the sea (after all, he was exiled on a small island), he knew fire, he knew glass. What he saw, we do not know, but it must have been something that moved or undulated, like the sea, was transparent or semi-transparent, and was red and flickering and (possibly) gave out heat. Here, then, we have two experiences, the one unknown to the ancient Greeks and the other unknown to us; yet both have been made meaningful by using and combining known categories,

SCHOOLS HOLD THE FUTURE OF OUR COUNTRY IN THEIR HANDS
Not so very long ago, schools like the one above taught the three 'R's and maintained high standards. Even inner city schools offered an education comparable to any in the world. Today, illiteracy is a growing problem.

This is one important aspect of Education: the ever-increasing multiplication of receptacles. However, there are two other aspects, which are equally important.

MEMORY

The first is the retention of receptacles. It is no use adding wealth to our experience if we immediately put it into a pocket with a hole in it. Memory is the totality of experience, the great receptacle of receptacles. Memory can be trained — must be trained; and today it is not. So many people have commented to me on the performance of, say, a concert pianist, and their wonder is not at the technical ability (that seems to be taken for granted), the musical gift of interpreting the composer's intentions (that appears to be an unknown factor in contemporary education), but: "How did he memorise all that?" I once raised a gasp of all but incredulous astonishment from some young people by reciting The Walrus and the Carpenter from memory at a Christmas Party. It was noticeable that the older people appreciated my interpretation of the poem, but were not at all impressed by my having it by heart. My own rule for teaching is "If you haven't got it in your head, you don't know it," a rule that I have to abandon for an increasing number of examinations where the pupil is allowed to take his text-book, and even his bulky folder of notes, into the examination. Certain aids are valid for examinations: tables of logarithms, dictionaries of foreign languages (but only at the highest level, and for examinations in technical translation); but the A.E.B. A level examination in English Literature requires no memorisation. The intelligent pupil (or the one guided by even a moderately intelligent teacher) fills the fly-leaf and margins of his copy of Hamlet or her copy of Jane Eyre with the teacher's notes, or the notes the teacher has culled from the multifarious teaching-aids available to teachers who cannot teach, with cross-references, takes the book into the examination, and copies these notes in some sort of order on the examination paper. If the teacher is a good teacher (rare nowadays) or the teaching aids are sensible and accurate (just as rare), the result is an A for a pupil who knows nothing whatsoever about either text. Even if the teacher is only moderately competent, a B will result. As an entry qualification to a proper University, it is useless; but the Government has now created universities where such ignorance will pass unnoticed by lecturers who themselves have recently qualified by the same kind of examination.³

There is a subtle inference here, which I shall develop later. People who do not remember have few standards for comparison. They cannot remember better things that they have lost. They also have little knowledge, and are prone to quick and unstable judgements. They are soon convinced by those who have only shallow arguments; they are easily led by small-brained demagogues; they will not notice that the political statement of yesterday is different from the political argument of today. Furthermore, education now fosters decisions based on inadequate knowledge. For example, a child is invited by means of a series of cartoons (for what state-educated child today is taught the necessity of reading and understanding solid factual text?) to comment on the murder in the Tower of the two Princes by Richard III. Thus, children, with no knowledge of history, evaluate the character of a king according to shallow, carefully slanted evidence. And the decision of a child fed on a diet of comic-strip education, of course, is right. We must not inhibit, we must not make value-judgements — except on Richard III.⁴

The second aspect is the quality of the receptacle. The governing factor is ethical, and not all the sneers about 'value-judgments' (themselves a form of value-judgement) can alter the fact that some things are good and others bad; and most of us can rise to the higher position where some things are better, and some worse. This can be defined as the refining of receptacles: the advance from the cartoon to the book, the popular song to the symphony, the picture-book to the National Gallery. Of course, in an ideal society, the lower or lesser would be of the same quality as the higher and greater. The same person could appreciate the popular song and the symphony, the children's story and the epic poem, the cartoon and the landscape. In fact, this often occurs: one can appreciate Sing a Song of Sixpence and Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, Treasure Island and Paradise Lost, the wit of 'Bab' and visual splendour of Rubens' The Farm at Laeken.⁵ The advance is one of addition or multiplication, not of substitution or snobbery. Nevertheless, what is bad in quality should be abandoned in favour of what is good, at whatever level of experience. Whether it is a clump of scented stocks or a pipeful of heather mixture, either is preferable to the spurious satisfaction of drugs.

GET YOURSELF A PHONELINE!

A MESSAGE FROM COLIN SMITH (GREENWICH BNP)

AS many people are no doubt aware, communication is a problem in the BNP. It is so both within the party itself, between activists/members/organisers etc., and, more importantly, between ourselves and the 'Great British Public.'

Of course we now have to adapt to the problem of not being able to use No. 154 as any form of HQ. This could become a major inconvenience in the build-up towards the General Election (I remember how the telephones were continually buzzing after September 1993).

I started up the Greenwich BNP phonenumber firstly to give ourselves an identity with the local people. If they don't take us seriously then they are not going to vote for us. The phonenumber is also used as a contact point for activities.

Greenwich Council and associates are now convinced we have an office in the borough. I have had tremendous fun at their expense. Only last week a lefty rang up and asked "is this your new HQ?" I said: "no." He then asked if it was one of our offices. I said that it was. "Could I have your address?" he asked cautiously. I asked him if he had a pen and paper to hand. He nearly fell over himself and replied in panting breath that he did. I then gave him the South East London PO Box number. The disappointment in his "thank you" was well worth that week's £1.70 line rental.

I do get serious enquiries, however, which has led to four new memberships, albeit to other units.

To assist the day-to-day running of the party we definitely need more of these phonelines up and down the country. This will both spread the workload and localise us with the public. It will also enable the party to really grow in these areas, also giving units the opportunity to do their own administration and not blame Head Office when things go wrong.

I believe it is only a matter of time before we will have more phone lines. Why put off until tomorrow what you can do today? After all, every other party or organisation has multiple telephone numbers apart from us.

correlation between politics and power!

Even given a landslide victory in a General Election, the maximum number of seats at Westminster available to UUP MPs is seventeen. Seventeen Unionists against more than six hundred predominantly hostile English, Scottish and Welsh MPs. The best the UUP could hope for is the role of a junior partner in a coalition government, temporarily postponing the inevitable day a United Ireland arrives.

The position of the Ulster Unionist Party is little more than that of a pressure group: effectively powerless and dependant upon the favours of the larger parties at Westminster, who at the end of the day have no wish to see Ulster within the United Kingdom.

It is now becoming increasingly obvious that only by the electoral victory of a truly unionist party which has the potential to command a majority of seats in parliament will Ulster's position within the United Kingdom be secure. That vehicle can only be the British National Party.

Now we have established that the official Unionist Party is: (a) committed to multiculturalism and, (b) totally powerless in the face of parliamentary treachery, it ought to be discarded as an obsolete institution that has outlived its usefulness to both Northern Ireland and unionism generally.

Ulster Unionists must now collaborate with the BNP if they are serious about maintaining a genuinely British Ulster. It must be a Britishness founded upon common racial ancestry and a common cultural inheritance, not the shallow, sterile reverence to the Union flag as practised by the UUP and the Tories, without any understanding of what that glorious symbol really represents.

'Racist' attack victims: notice who's missing?

Another loony-lefty group surfaced last month after it was disclosed that one of its members had thrown a pot of orange paint over the suit of Tory Party Chairman Dr. Brian Mawhinney in protest against the Government's Asylum Bill, aimed supposedly at stopping bogus asylum claimants flooding into Britain. The group calls itself the 'Movement for Justice' and is headed by Nick De Marco, a taxpayer-subsidised parasite who has a long record as a left-wing militant and is now serving time as student union president at Kingsway College.

After the paint-throwing, De Marco and his cronies held a well publicised press conference at the college canteen (why was this allowed?), at which they explained their action. "What happened," he said, "was a declaration of war on the Government. We will stop it by any means necessary."

Behind the paint-throwers was a big banner, which can be seen in the photo of the press conference reproduced here. Readers will see that it is a relic from a march held back in February of this year against 'racist attacks'. The names of several 'racist attack' victims are shown across the bottom of the banner, including — for what reason we do not know — Winston Silcott! Conspicuous by its absence is the name of Richard Everitt, whose racist murderer came up for trial at the Old Bailey at the end of October, getting life imprisonment. Why the omission? Richard Everitt, unlike any of those honoured on the Movement for Justice's banner, was white, while his killer, Badrul Miah, is Asian.

The hypocrisy of these 'Anti-Racists' is almost beyond belief!

RICHARD EVERITT
None of the 'anti-racists' want to remember his killing

RACIAL HATRED: WHO ARE THE GUILTY ONES?

horse, because it is recorded in their friezes and sculptures. Alexander the Great's horse, Bucephalos, was a trotting horse.

These horses were renowned for their racial purity, stamina and resistance to disease, which was twice that of other present day horses. They even had extra hard hooves, which didn't split or wear down. Where is this horse today? Extinct on mainland Europe, it is now confined to Iceland and known as the Icelandic horse.

No horses have been imported to Iceland since Viking times, and the strain there is unadulterated and hardy.

Continental and British European horses, by comparison, despite even the most careful attempts to breed desirable traits, are weaker and more prone to disease, with particular degeneration in the leg bones of even the best racehorses.

In Iceland, the import of foreign horses was forbidden by the Althing in 930 A.D. By contrast, the rest of Europe has had countless foreign infusions of horse blood, leading to infertility and genetic deterioration. Breeders' attempted to remedy this by endless imports of Arabian and Persian blood.

Icelandic ponies are robustly healthy, weather-resistant, versatile, long-lived, mentally stable, patient and intelligent. They are able to traverse any terrain at remarkable speed.

AGAINST HEALTH AND STRENGTH

As it is with horses, so it is with people. Race-haters intend to replace qualities of health, strength and the particular unique racial characteristics of each and every natural human race with sickness, weakness and a bland uniformity with a slave-like mentality.

Race-haters detest the beauty and the special essence of race. They make every attempt to subvert the natural evolution towards greater and greater distinctiveness and specialisation. Instead, they have a deliberate, methodical and openly declared ambition to mix and mongrelise all people into one kind. They fantasise over what the ideal woman, a computer generated composite of various mixed racial features, might look like in their supposed utopia. They do not realise the truth, that such a creature would, in reality, be a grossly ugly, misshapen, sickly, unintelligent, spiritless, rootless mongrel zombie.

The immigration policy which has been imposed upon Britain should be seen as a violation of the United Nations prohibition of genocide, which decrees that all ethnic groups are entitled to have their own space and culture.

In the global village, there are three million Welsh, five million Scots, one billion Indians, one and a half billion Chinese, for example. So who is the 'minority' here? Surely it is genocide that there are fewer Welsh living in Britain than there are Asians living in Britain. If the law against racial hatred means anything, then it is those who deny our race its right to be separate and self-sufficient who should be punished for their viciousness.

We wish to inform readers that the writer of this article is not the Lynda Miller well-known to East London activists, but a lady from the north of England.

STOP PRESS

There was no sabotage, say police

After the writing of our report of police sabotage of the BNP rally on page 23 and just before our going to the printer, the British National Party received the following letter from the police in Chelmsford, Essex:-

Dear Mr. Tyndall,

I refer to your letter of the 14th inst. addressed to Inspector Bird, regarding the cancellation of conference facilities by the Five Lakes Hotel, Golf & Country Club, Colchester Road, Tolleshunt Knights, Maldon, scheduled to be held at that venue on Saturday, 11 November 1995.

I have had enquiries made regarding this matter and have been informed that representatives of the hotel contacted their hotel agents in London to ascertain if your party required refreshments whilst you were in attendance.

From these agents the hotel learnt that refreshments would not be required and that it was a booking to be attended by members of a right-wing organisation.

Having been given this information, the hotel management were concerned who would be attending and then contacted Maldon Police, requesting assistance to clarify who the 'right-wing organisation' could be.

Enquiries made by the police established that the conference room had been booked by members of the British National Party and that information was relayed to the hotel management.

At no time did any member of Essex Police suggest your booking be cancelled by the hotel.

I trust this information clarifies the matter.

D.G. RENSCH (Chief Inspector)

We have the following comments to make in reply to this letter: (1) Richard Edmonds, when making the booking, was asked by the hotel if refreshments would be required and he replied that they would not. Was it likely that the hotel staff would then find it necessary to ring again and enquire? (2) If they did, why would they not ring Mr. Edmonds instead of the agents? (3) It hardly seems likely that the agents would give information to the hotel which could jeopardise the booking and thus deprive them of their customary commission. (4) If they knew that the hirers were a 'right-wing organisation' they would also almost certainly know that the organisation was the BNP, and they would have told the hotel so, thus making it unnecessary for the latter to make enquiries concerning this to the police. (5) It would not be necessary for the police to suggest the booking be cancelled, only to inform the hotel as to who made it.

BNP WEB SITE

The BNP is now established on the internet with its own home page, or web site, called British National Party News Service. That the party has established itself in this way is a tremendous advance. Because of its lack of regulation and censorship and its decentralised network, the internet is the most significant political development since the coming of television. Market forces will over the next two years propel the internet to a user base of over 5 million. These people will be able to read British Nationalist & Spearhead and access BNP comment & news at the click of a button. Government censorship is completely bypassed.

Have you joined the Welling Club?

The Welling Club is a special group that has been formed for the purpose of raising money for the British National Party. Membership is open to all persons, whether or not BNP members, willing to contribute £20 each month to the party's funds.

Welling Club members will be sent regular bulletins informing them of progress in achieving various BNP projects for which their donations are required. They will also be entitled to attend, free of charge, an annual club dinner addressed by the BNP Chairman.

Those wishing to join the Welling Club should apply, sending their initial £20 contribution (made out to the British National Party), to PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

LETTERS

SIR: Appropos of the recent announcement that the BNP and Spearhead are now on the Internet, you may be interested in a letter which appeared in The Times of November 15th, written by Mr. Edward Timms, who signed himself as the Director of the Centre for German-Jewish Studies at Sussex University, which said:-

"Sir, You are right to raise the alarm about the dissemination of erotica through university computer networks ('Oxford censors pornography on the Internet', November 13).

"Even more disturbing is the unrestricted use of the Internet by racist political groups spreading propaganda under headings like 'white power' (neo-Nazism) and 'revisionism' (Holocaust denial).

"The Internet may, as you say, have become 'a symbol of freedom of expression', but it is equally important to establish proper procedures for monitoring how it is used. Indeed, ultimately the question of legal controls on materials which infringe (for example) anti-racist legislation will surely have to be faced."

This gentleman apparently thinks there are worse things than 'erotica'!

EDITOR'S NOTE: Mr Timms' excuse for trying to outlaw 'racist' propaganda on the Internet is the same as that used by many local authorities who deny 'racists' the hire of meeting halls: that what is said is 'illegal' under anti-racist legislation. This is nonsense, even supposing one supports this legislation. If things said in these meeting halls or on the Internet violate the race laws, the way is open for the powers-that-be to prosecute the people responsible. Mr. Timms' attitude seems to assume that everything said or written from a 'racist' point of view promotes 'race hatred' and is thus illegal, which is not the case.

SIR: The hinge paragraph in Gitta Sereny's recent biography of Hitler's war production chief Albert Speer (Macmillan: £25.00) is:-

"One of the great psychological mysteries about the Third Reich has always been Hitler's ability to convince a nation of culturally sophisticated men and women that wrong was right."

This paragraph, suitably amended, applies in every detail to the mystery about how the UK has been persuaded to accept the Afro-Asian invasion!

SIR: On the topic of rock and roll, the newsletter Candour recently serialised a lecture entitled 'Hell to Play', by Sandro Soriano.

This lecture gives prolific examples, which were played forwards and backwards, of how rock music is being used to brainwash its listeners, principally by means of messages superimposed backwards onto a recording. These obviously cannot normally be understood by the conscious mind, but the subconscious mind can 'hear' them as if they were played forwards, so it is claimed by the lecturer, and is influenced as if by a command from a hypnotist.

Listeners to many rock music recordings are therefore, unknown to themselves, being subjected to systematic brainwashing. A preponderance of the wording of these messages aims to instil adherence to Satanism and political internationalism into the victims.

Ordinarily, it is impossible for listeners to detect which albums are tainted in this way or what messages they contain, and I suspect that this form of brainwashing might have been significantly responsible for our country's catastrophic decline in recent decades.

The fact that some rock fans may have escaped this pernicious influence could perhaps be explained in the same way as the fact that some people do not respond to hypnosis, although many others do.

SIR: Just recently, the mass media have been busy reviving the 'Beatles Era', with a great of time being given to play-backs of the performances of this group, as well as whole discussion programmes being given up to the subject.

One such programme was The Time, the Place, on ITV in the morning of November 24th. On this programme one participant stated that the Beatles liked to think of themselves as having "fathered a revolution," while another spoke of the group and their music becoming symbols of 'rebellion', saying that this led him to grow his hair long as a 'rebel' gesture.

I didn't know whether to laugh or cry. Are these people really serious when they describe themselves as 'rebels' and the Beatles as 'revolutionaries'? True rebellion takes more than just growing long hair. Rebellion today, in the only meaningful sense, means fighting against the internationalist, multi-racialist, 'liberal' establishment — an establishment which, far from being challenged by the likes of the Beatles, takes them to its embrace as if they were part of it — which of course they are.

In the times in which we live, the only genuine rebels are the BNP and groups of similar outlook and objectives — in other words, nationalists!

SIR: I was sorry to learn from your article in September, 'Doing the Enemy's Work', of the troubles currently affecting the party, and I wish to assure you of my continued support.

It is an unfortunate fact that there are those who cannot adapt to changing circumstances and fail to see that new tactics are required to meet new situations.

The BNP is not alone in this respect. All political parties face this problem from time to time.

The type of person who offers constructive criticism is to be encouraged; certainly one should not surround oneself with 'yes-men'. But disruptive types are best disposed of. It should be expected that the sort of foes the BNP has would try and infiltrate the party and subvert it, sowing seeds of dissension. However, they will not succeed if firmly dealt with. Such tendencies must be nipped in the bud and not allowed to grow.

Please do not let any of this deflect you from the course on which you are set. You have taken the right decision.

SIR: The Labour Party claims to have recruited over a hundred thousand members since 'Bambi' became its leader last year, and to have overtaken the Conservatives in membership for the first time ever. The latest membership figure quoted by Labour is 360,000, and the party hopes this will grow to half a million by the next election.

It is quite obvious that Labour has embarked on a cynical campaign to 'con' gullible members of the public into joining the party so as to give the impression of growth and boost the party's funds.

It will be interesting to find out how many of these suckers keep up their membership. I believe that should Labour win the next election and get in its usual mess it will find most of these new members fading away like the morning mist.

BNP membership may be small at the moment but at least these party members aren't dupes!

SIR: It has been announced recently that murderer Winston Silcott could be on the brink of freedom. Silcott has now been classified as a 'low risk' prisoner and is likely to be eligible for parole from early next year.

The police oppose this move but it looks like the Home Office is ordering it so as to appease the 'race lobby'. God help us!

Please note this fact, which is of great importance: the books sold through the BNP Book Service are written by many different kinds of authors holding a number of different political viewpoints, very few of them being in any way connected with the British National Party. The party's Book Service distributes these books because it is felt that they fill important gaps in public information and understanding of vital national and international issues. This does not mean that all of what is printed in these books should necessarily be taken as representative of the policies of the British National Party. We reserve the right to differ with some of the authors on some parts of their writings.

footsteps of David Irving in his Churchill's War in its demolition of the myth of Churchill as a great national leader. The author is in fact less personally scathing in his treatment of his subject than is Irving, even stating that Churchill was a 'great man'. Nevertheless, the book highlights our war Premier's overweening personal ambition and is particularly critical of his failure to come to an agreement with Hitler after British forces had been defeated in Europe in 1940. Rally goes ahead despite massive sabotage operation

The holding of the British National Party's Annual Rally in London on the 11th November was a triumph over adversity after the party had thwarted a series of attempts to deprive it of premises for the event. As the report on the opposite page will show, we have strong evidence that this attempted sabotage operation was carried out by the police, no doubt at the behest of the Home Office — in other words, the Government.

After the party had lost two bookings of large and well-appointed hotel conference rooms, the rally was eventually held in two adjoining rooms in a pub in London's East End. The facilities were far too small and most in attendance had to stand. Furthermore, many of those in the smaller of the two rooms were not able properly to hear the speeches. The event can be accounted a success in view of these big handicaps. It ended in great enthusiasm with a magnificent collection of nearly £3,600.

As first speaker, National Organiser Richard Edmonds emphasised the importance of the party's plan to contest 50 seats at the next general election. The British people, he said, were showing that they are losing faith in all of the main parties, and there are tremendous opportunities for the BNP in the future if it can manage this important breakthrough.

He was followed by one of the overseas guests of the day, Thomas Andersson, of the Sweden Democrats, a party not dissimilar in aims to the BNP. Mr. Andersson spoke of the situation in Sweden, where there is a large non-white immigrant problem, as in Britain. Swedes, he said, are the descendants of the Vikings and as such have a proud race history. Modern liberalism and the softening influences of Sweden's welfare state, however, have done a great deal to sap the old Viking spirit, which the SD are determined to revive.

There were then a series of interesting and informative regional reports from around the country given by: Iain Wilson (Yorkshire); Christian Jackson (North West England); Keith Axon (Midlands); Warren Bennett (Scotland) and Barry Osborne (East London). All of these showed enthusiasm and determination towards the task of preparing for the next general election and were most heartening to the audience.

BNP Press Officer Michael Newland came next. He spoke of the underlying collapse of the liberal system, which could be seen in many manifestations, such as the increasing challenges to liberal dogma made in the mass media. The BNP, he said, already has the public on its side over most of the issues and can therefore be said largely to have "won the argument." There still remains, however, the economic argument against the 'free-traders', which the party has yet to win. This is going to assume increasing importance in the times ahead.

As next speaker, the audience heard one of the most interesting personalities on the political scene. He was Dr. William Pierce, head of the American-based National Alliance, who spoke of the operations of his group in the United States. Dr. Pierce began by stressing the differences in operating conditions between American and British patriotic movements, which called sometimes for different methods of promotion. Of particular interest was his report of the NA's radio programme, American Dissident Voices, which had reached millions of short-wave radio listeners in the USA and even some in the United Kingdom — a project which, due to much tighter state control of broadcasting in Britain, would not at the moment be possible here. Also of much interest was Dr. Pierce's description of the National Alliance's big bookselling enterprise, known as National Vanguard Books, the profits of which did much to finance other NA projects.

In the final speech of the day, BNP leader John Tyndall summarised the campaign that had been waged over the past two years by the establishment to smash the BNP, a campaign culminating in the efforts to prevent its Annual Rally being held. He spoke of the hypocrisy of 'liberals', who believed in freedom for junkies and for queers and freedom for the alien invader to pour over our frontiers, but not the freedom of patriots to hold meetings like the present one to challenge the establishment. He spoke of how this indicated the desperation of the old world of politics and its fear of the challenge that the BNP represented. The world of our enemies, he said, is, like the 20th century, coming to an end; and the new century will be one the white peoples' rejuvenated glory.

Footnote: One handicap existing at the meeting was the fact that, to make the party's use of the premises profitable to the owners, it was necessary for the bar to be kept open — contrary to normal party rules governing such occasions. Unfortunately, a small element in the audience, well lubricated by drink, engaged in constant chatter during the speeches which was most discourteous to the speakers, particularly the party's guests from abroad. Stewards ascertained that these rowdy elements mainly comprised followers of 'Combat 18', who were making a noise in the hope that in the event of their being asked to leave they could stage a disturbance and hold up the meeting — possibly even getting it stopped by the landlord. For this reason it was decided to take no action against them, although the noise-makers could easily have been thrown out if the stewards had sought to do so. This slightly marred the meeting but the demonstration of bad manners could have won no friends for Combat 18. This rabble ended their exhibition by plastering their stickers over the toilets — an appropriate place for their activity. These were removed by BNP personnel before departure.

THE SINISTER WORKINGS OF JOHN MAJOR'S POLICE STATE

How they tried to stop the BNP Rally

After the last few years' experiences, we were on our guard. We had seen signs before that both the Government, working through the police, and groups of the militant left would like to scupper our Annual Rally. Government and police? Yes, Government and police! Such things actually do go on in this country — contrary to popular supposition that Britain is a 'democracy'.

We carefully chose a location for the rally far from where anyone might expect we would hold it — or so we thought! It was a conference room in a hotel a little east of Maldon in Essex. The room was well appointed, with all necessary facilities, and had seating for over 400 people. Only three people in the whole party knew of this venue. The plan was to muster our supporters at a number of assembly points around and just outside the London area. There their leaders would be redirected by mobile telephone to a final assembly point not far from the meeting place, and from that final assembly point they would be taken to the meeting in a shuttle system operated by stewards. Nothing was left to chance.

Then, about 1½ weeks before the date of the rally, we were telephoned by the management of the hotel and informed that our booking had been cancelled. How had this happened? They had been visited by the 'authorities'. You mean the police? we asked. Yes, the police, they answered.

They would not say any more, and we were obliged to put together ourselves the remaining pieces of the puzzle. What must have happened is that the police told them all sorts of unsavoury and frightening things about the BNP and warned them that if they allowed the booking to stand they could expect demonstrations, riots and damage to their property — plus lots of undesirable publicity. Of course they caved in.

SIMON WOODALL reports

Just how did the police find out? We can only surmise that they did it by means of a big operation in which London and the Home Counties were completely combed, with police officers — probably local — contacting owners of every conference room or hall in their areas over and above a certain minimum size and ascertaining whether someone had made a booking for November 11th. Every such organisation making a booking would then have been checked out, with the result that eventually the booking at this particular hotel was traced to the BNP.

By necessity — and not by its own choice — our party is forced to conceal its identity when booking premises for meetings. All meeting facilities owned by local authorities are denied to us, whatever the political party in control. Owners of private halls are afraid of the very threats probably spelled out to the owners in this particular case: demos, riots, damage, etc. Because this is not a free country and we are not granted the normal right of freedom of assembly, we have to use subterfuge in order to have meetings at all, much, though we dislike doing so. In this respect we are in a position little different to that of the dissidents in Russia in the bad old days of communism.

The cancellation in Essex forced us to search for alternative premises. These were obtained at a hotel in Central London by similar methods. A day afterwards, this booking was also cancelled — almost certainly another police operation, although this time the hotel people would not admit it.

As the report opposite shows, we did eventually have our meeting. But even then the police had not finished with us. The driver of the coach bringing our people from Yorkshire was approached by police when waiting to pick up his passengers after the rally and told to drive back home without them, otherwise he would be arrested. The supporters who came down on this coach had to make their own way home at no small expense to themselves.

This matter is the subject of an official complaint and the people affected will be suing the police for compensation.

Who was behind this whole dirty operation? Well, we would not be surprised if 'politically correct' Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir Paul Condon had something to do with it — though of course the operation extended well beyond the London area.

All this was carried out against a perfectly lawful political party with a policy of campaigning by wholly constitutional and peaceful means. This is John Major's Britain — 1995!
